- It deals with the forms social disintegration in Chile and the effects for design of intervention social.
- To describe the changes sociodemographics of the last decades. To identify factors that they demonstrate the disintegration. To infer the impacts in the design and execution of strategies of intervention of TO. To serve as analysis model other realities and to favor the interdisciplinary in praxis of TO.
- TO develops his praxis in the context of a community historically determined. Thus, transformations in the social surroundings condition the design and execution of intervention strategies, specially taking care of the educational level or the integration degree/existing social disintegration in a population.
- The last decades constitute a period of deep transformations in the emergent countries, related to a phase of economic expansion. This dynamics registers and it is been from the other greater one, related to the consolidation of economies founded on relations of market and with a relative reduction of it is present at and it influences of the State.
- This produces a evolution unequal of the social groups. While the rich sectors accedes a comparable material well-being to the one of the first world, poorest they see to extend the distributive breach. This fact in himself generates of a dynamics of social disintegration; nevertheless, they are the changes that affect directly to poorest those of a greater effect.
- The extension of the demand like motor of the growth, has lead to that the new generations of more underprivileged it accedes to more goods and services via credit, that them difference of previous generations. The education is a significant reflection, as soon as to the variation of the years of schooling by segment. The disintegration, in this sense, it has a intergroup expression related to the breach intragroup, tie distributive tie and to the cancellation of the referring ones social/familiar.
- The intervention no longer can to suppose the existence of networks that favor the interaction.
- To contemplate this approach allows a more effective approach to the social space in which one looks for to take part from to and it fortifies the interdisciplinary contribution.
